From its very inception, the Place and Native Voice Project was both a collaborative undertaking and a team effort. Christine Whitacre, with the NPS Rocky Mountain Cooperative Ecosystem Studies Unit (a program that partners national parks with ecosystem researchers at participating colleges and universities in the Mountain West) welcomed the PNV proposal I prepared; and played a crucial role in the early days of its administration.

Several administrators at the Intermountain West Regional Headquarters of the National Park Service were also instrumental in assuring the continued growth and fine-tuning of the project. These included: Bill Gwaltney, , Dave Ruppert, Diana Wiggam, and—for the later years of its existence—Christine Landrum.

Additionally, the superintendents, chiefs of interpretation, and interpretive staff at all the national parks, monuments, and historic sites at which PNV interns have served since the Project's founding played an instrumental role in getting it up and running. They have also provided valuable advice to Project administrators on how it might be continuously improved.

At the University of Colorado Denver's School of Public Affairs, several administrators and staff have provided the professional expertise necessary to the success of the academic component of the PNV Project. These include Annie Davies, Jeanne Paradeis, Antoinette Sandoval, Dawn Savage, and Rose Segawa. The technical expertise necessary to develop and support the PNV website over time has been provided by Rob Drouillard, Parker Jackson, Eric Howell, and Andrew Pattison.

Finally, the Place and Native Voice Project would never have come into being were it not for the curiosity, courage, creativity, and perseverance of the students who have served as PNV interns. They are in an important sense the co-creators of the interpretive knowledge found in Sustainability and the Sacred. And it is their devotion to the preservation and perpetuation of their tribes' cultural and spiritual traditions that has truly given life to this endeavor.
